

Nature Remembers Motion

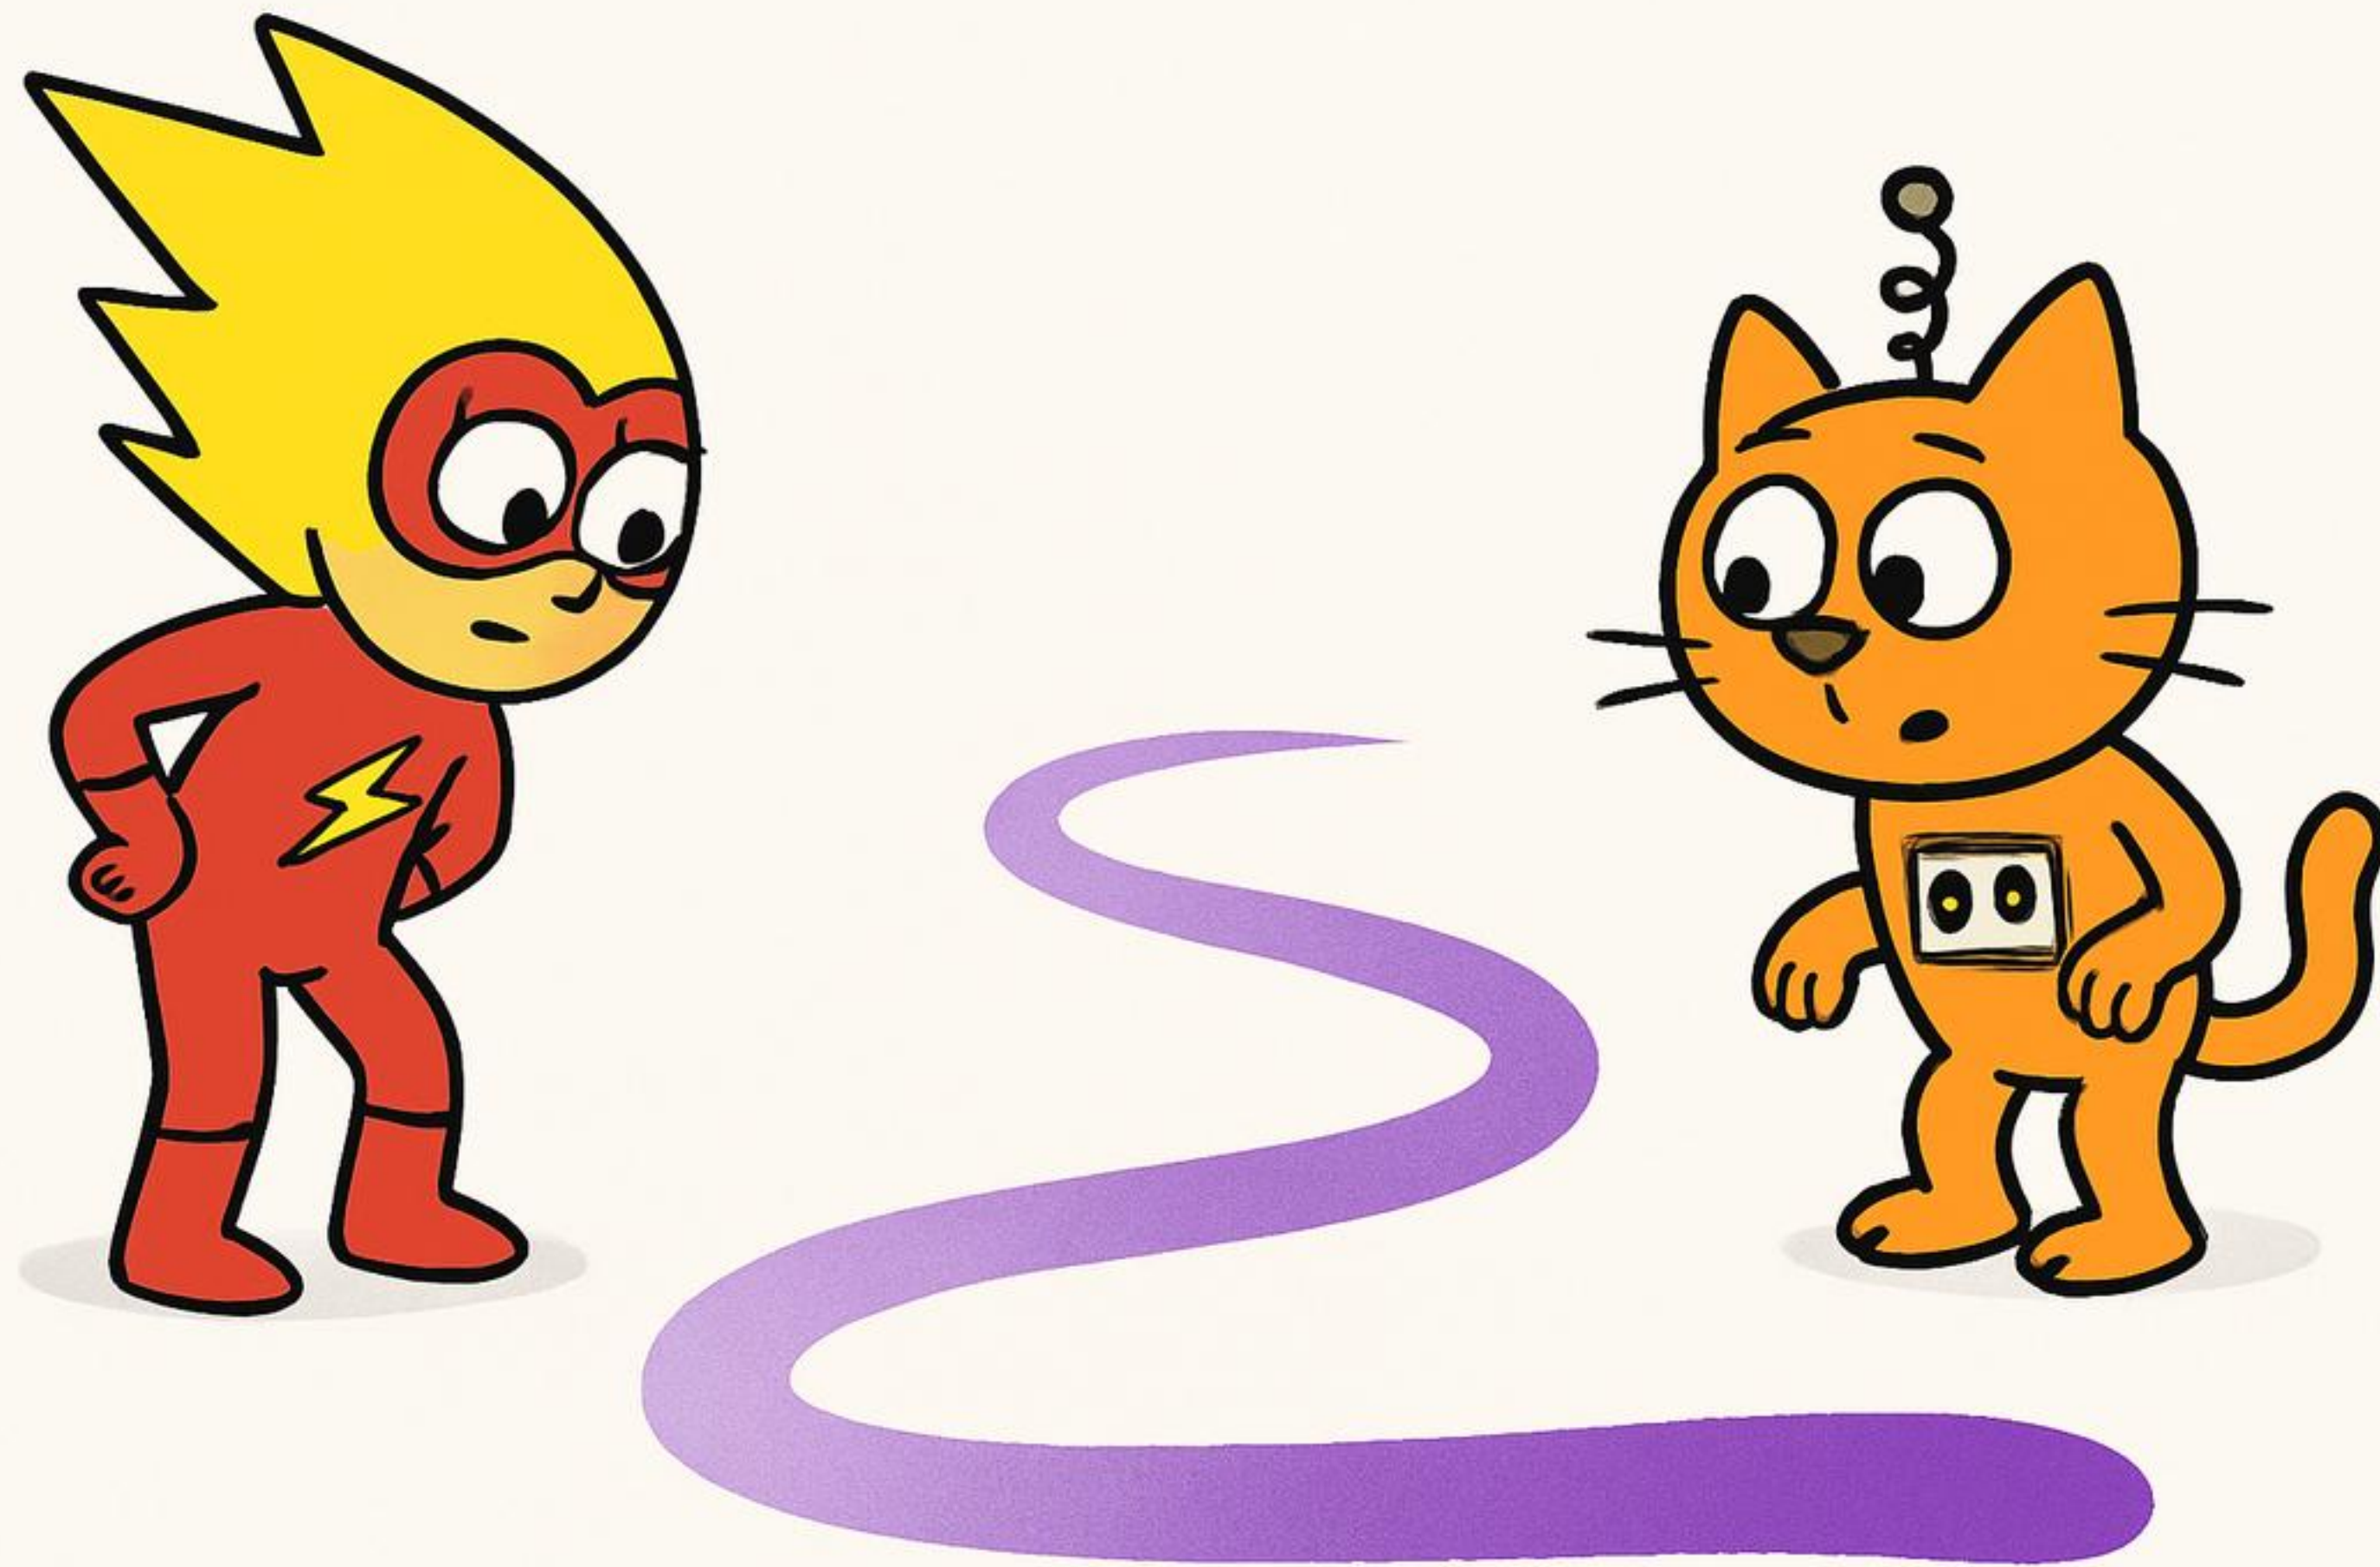

Electra pulled a ribbon.
The ribbon made a line.

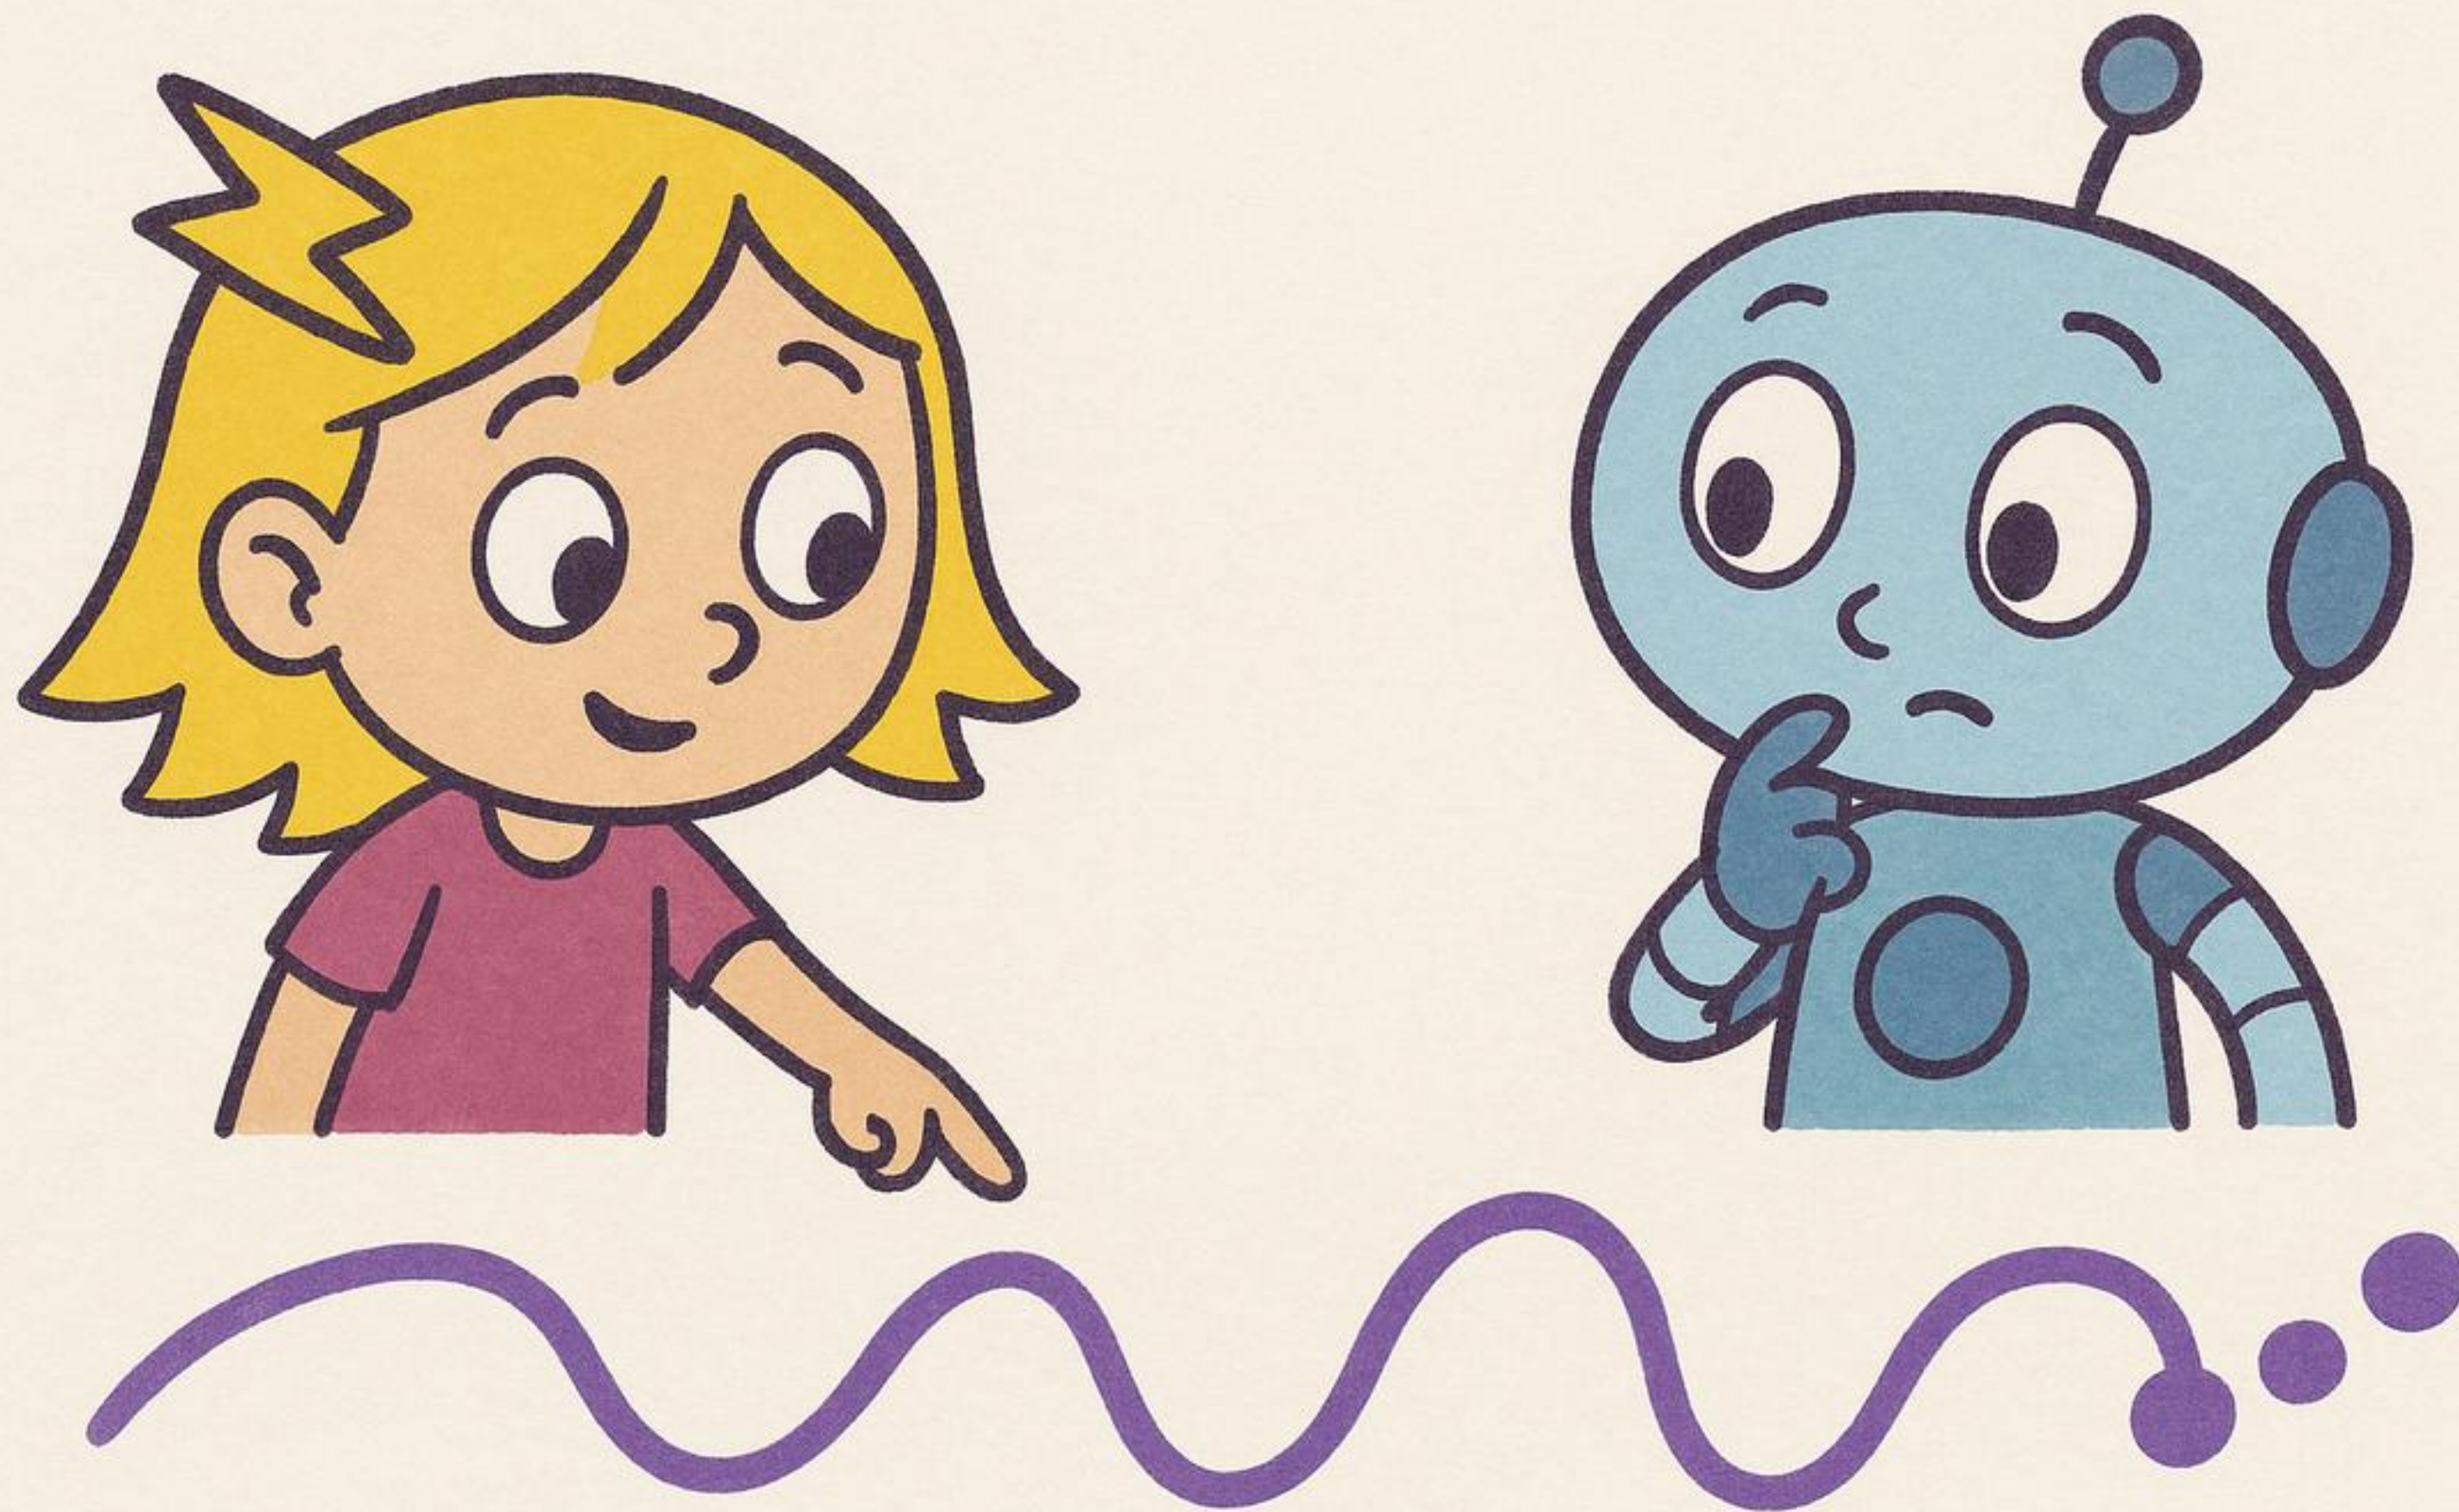

Poz rolled the red ball.
The ball went away.

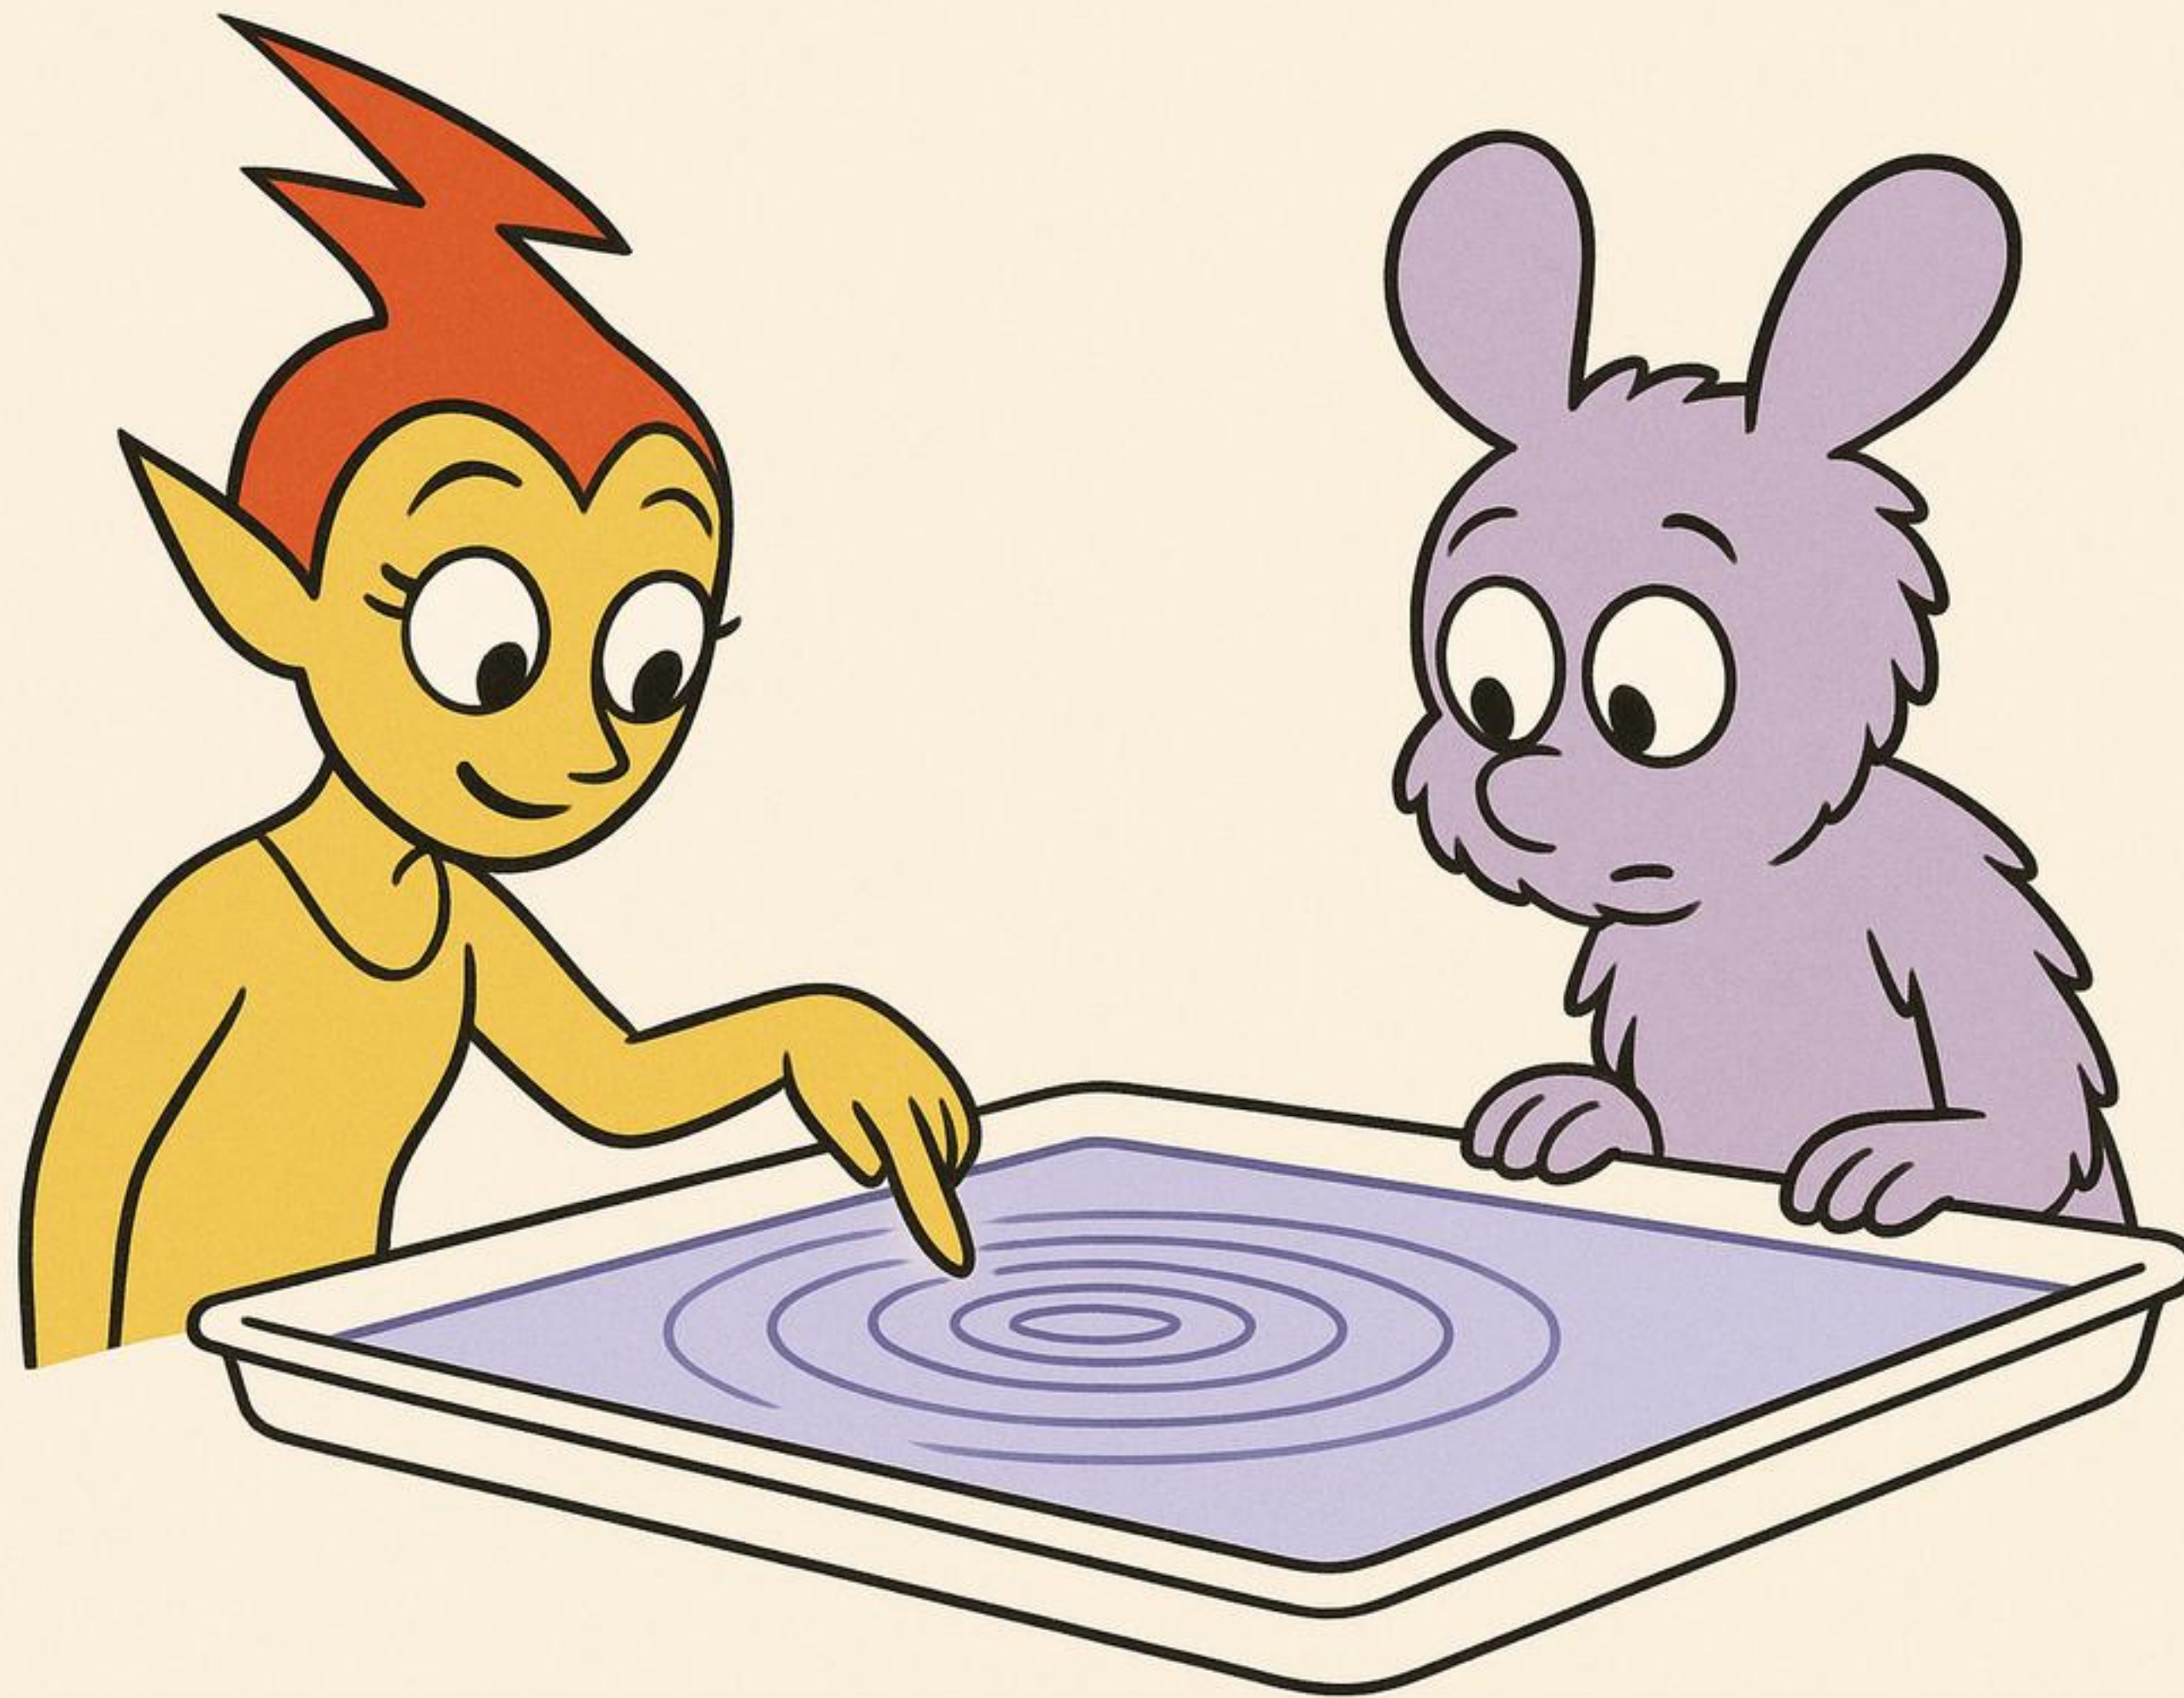

The ball was over there.
The trail was still here.

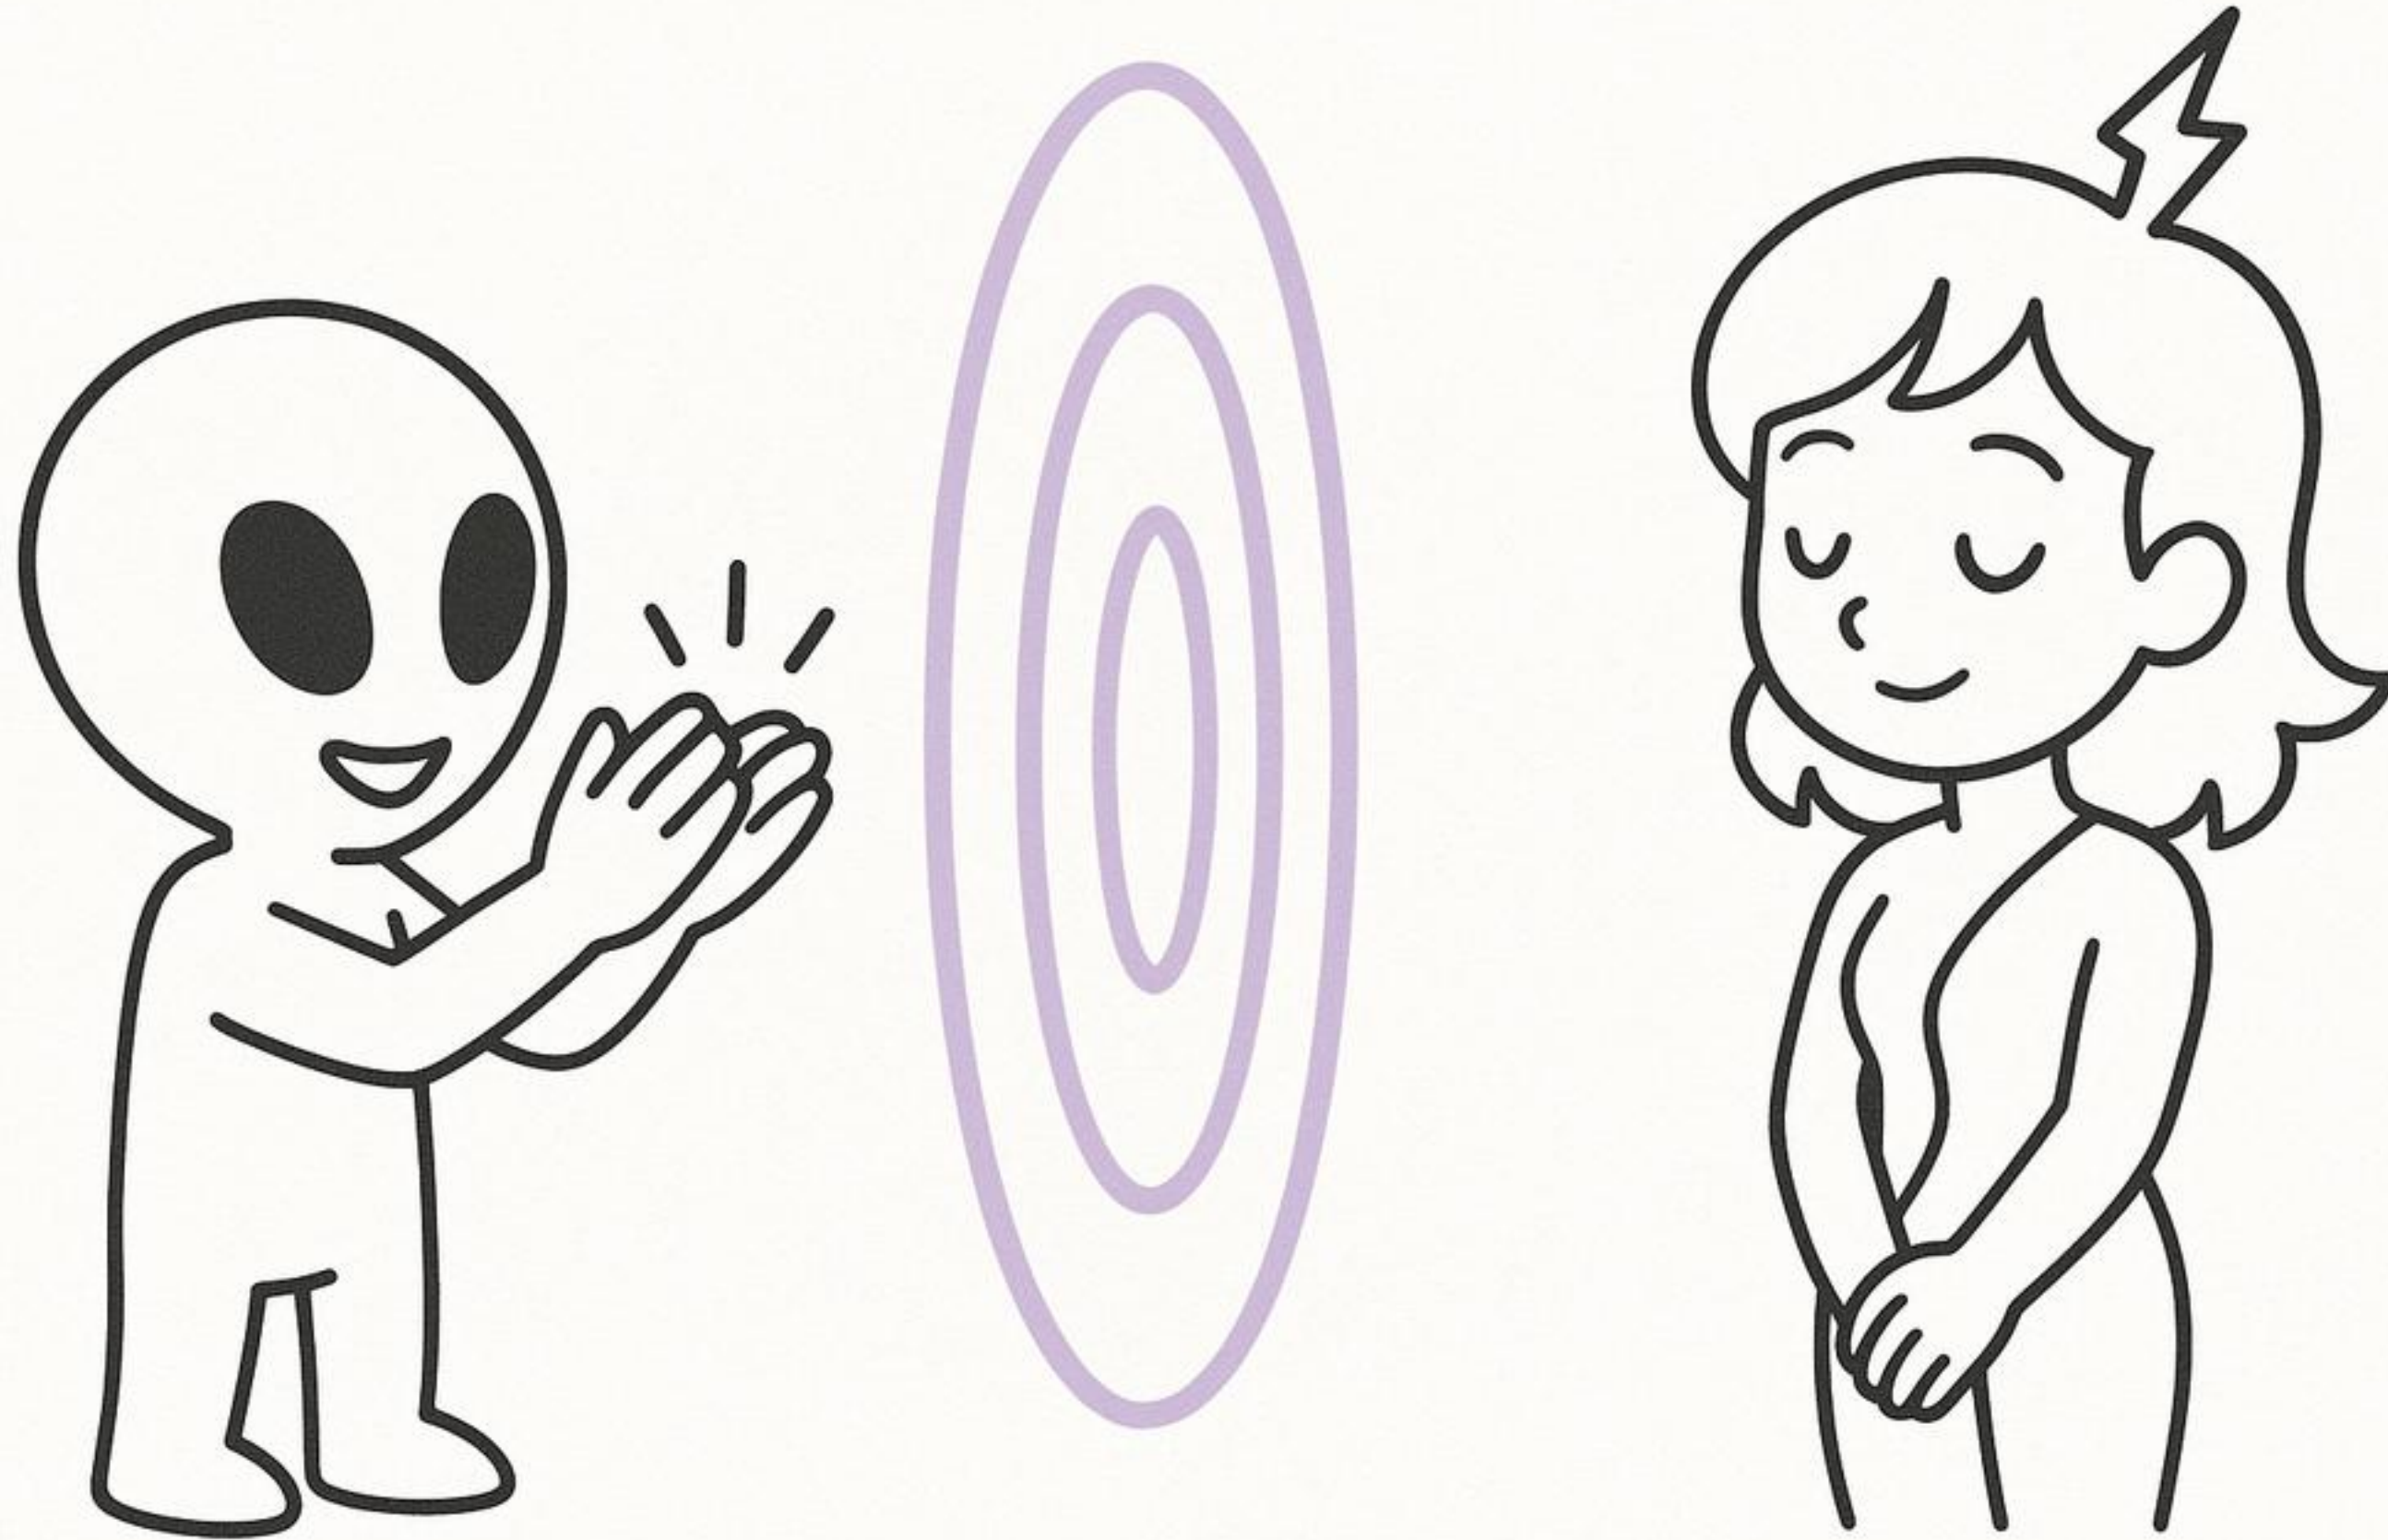

This part came first.
That part came next.

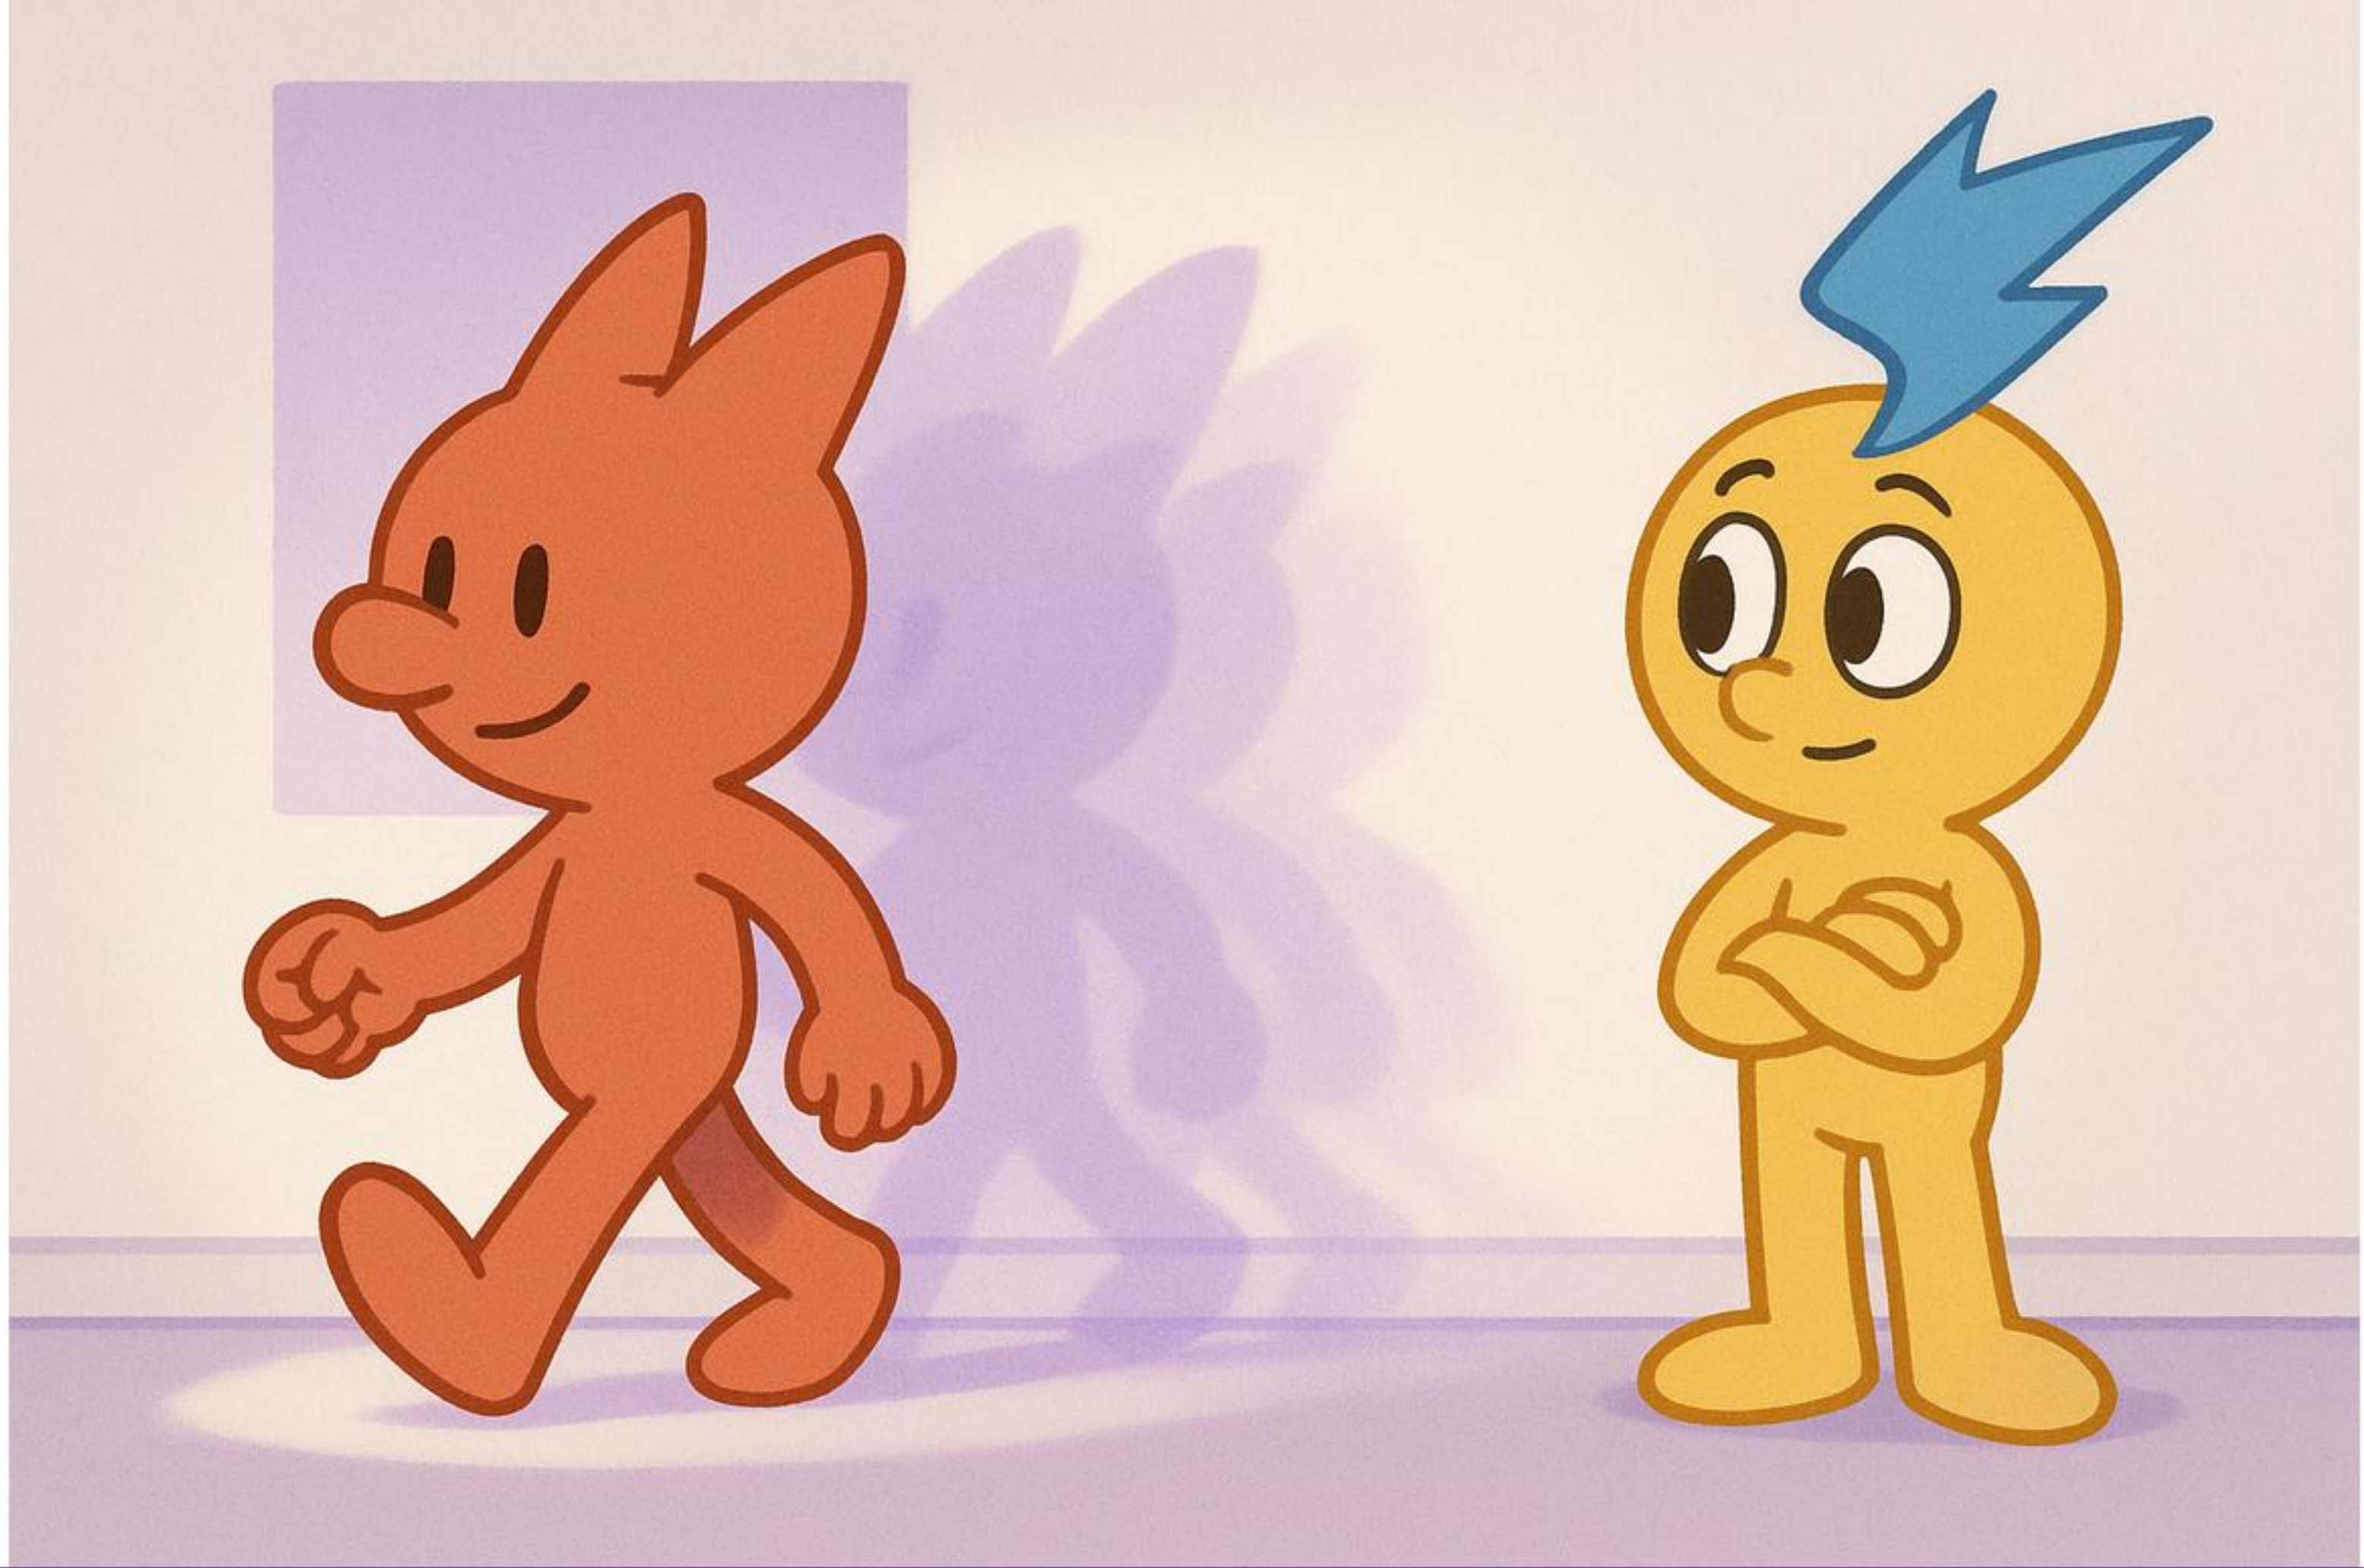

Some parts were close.
Some parts were far.

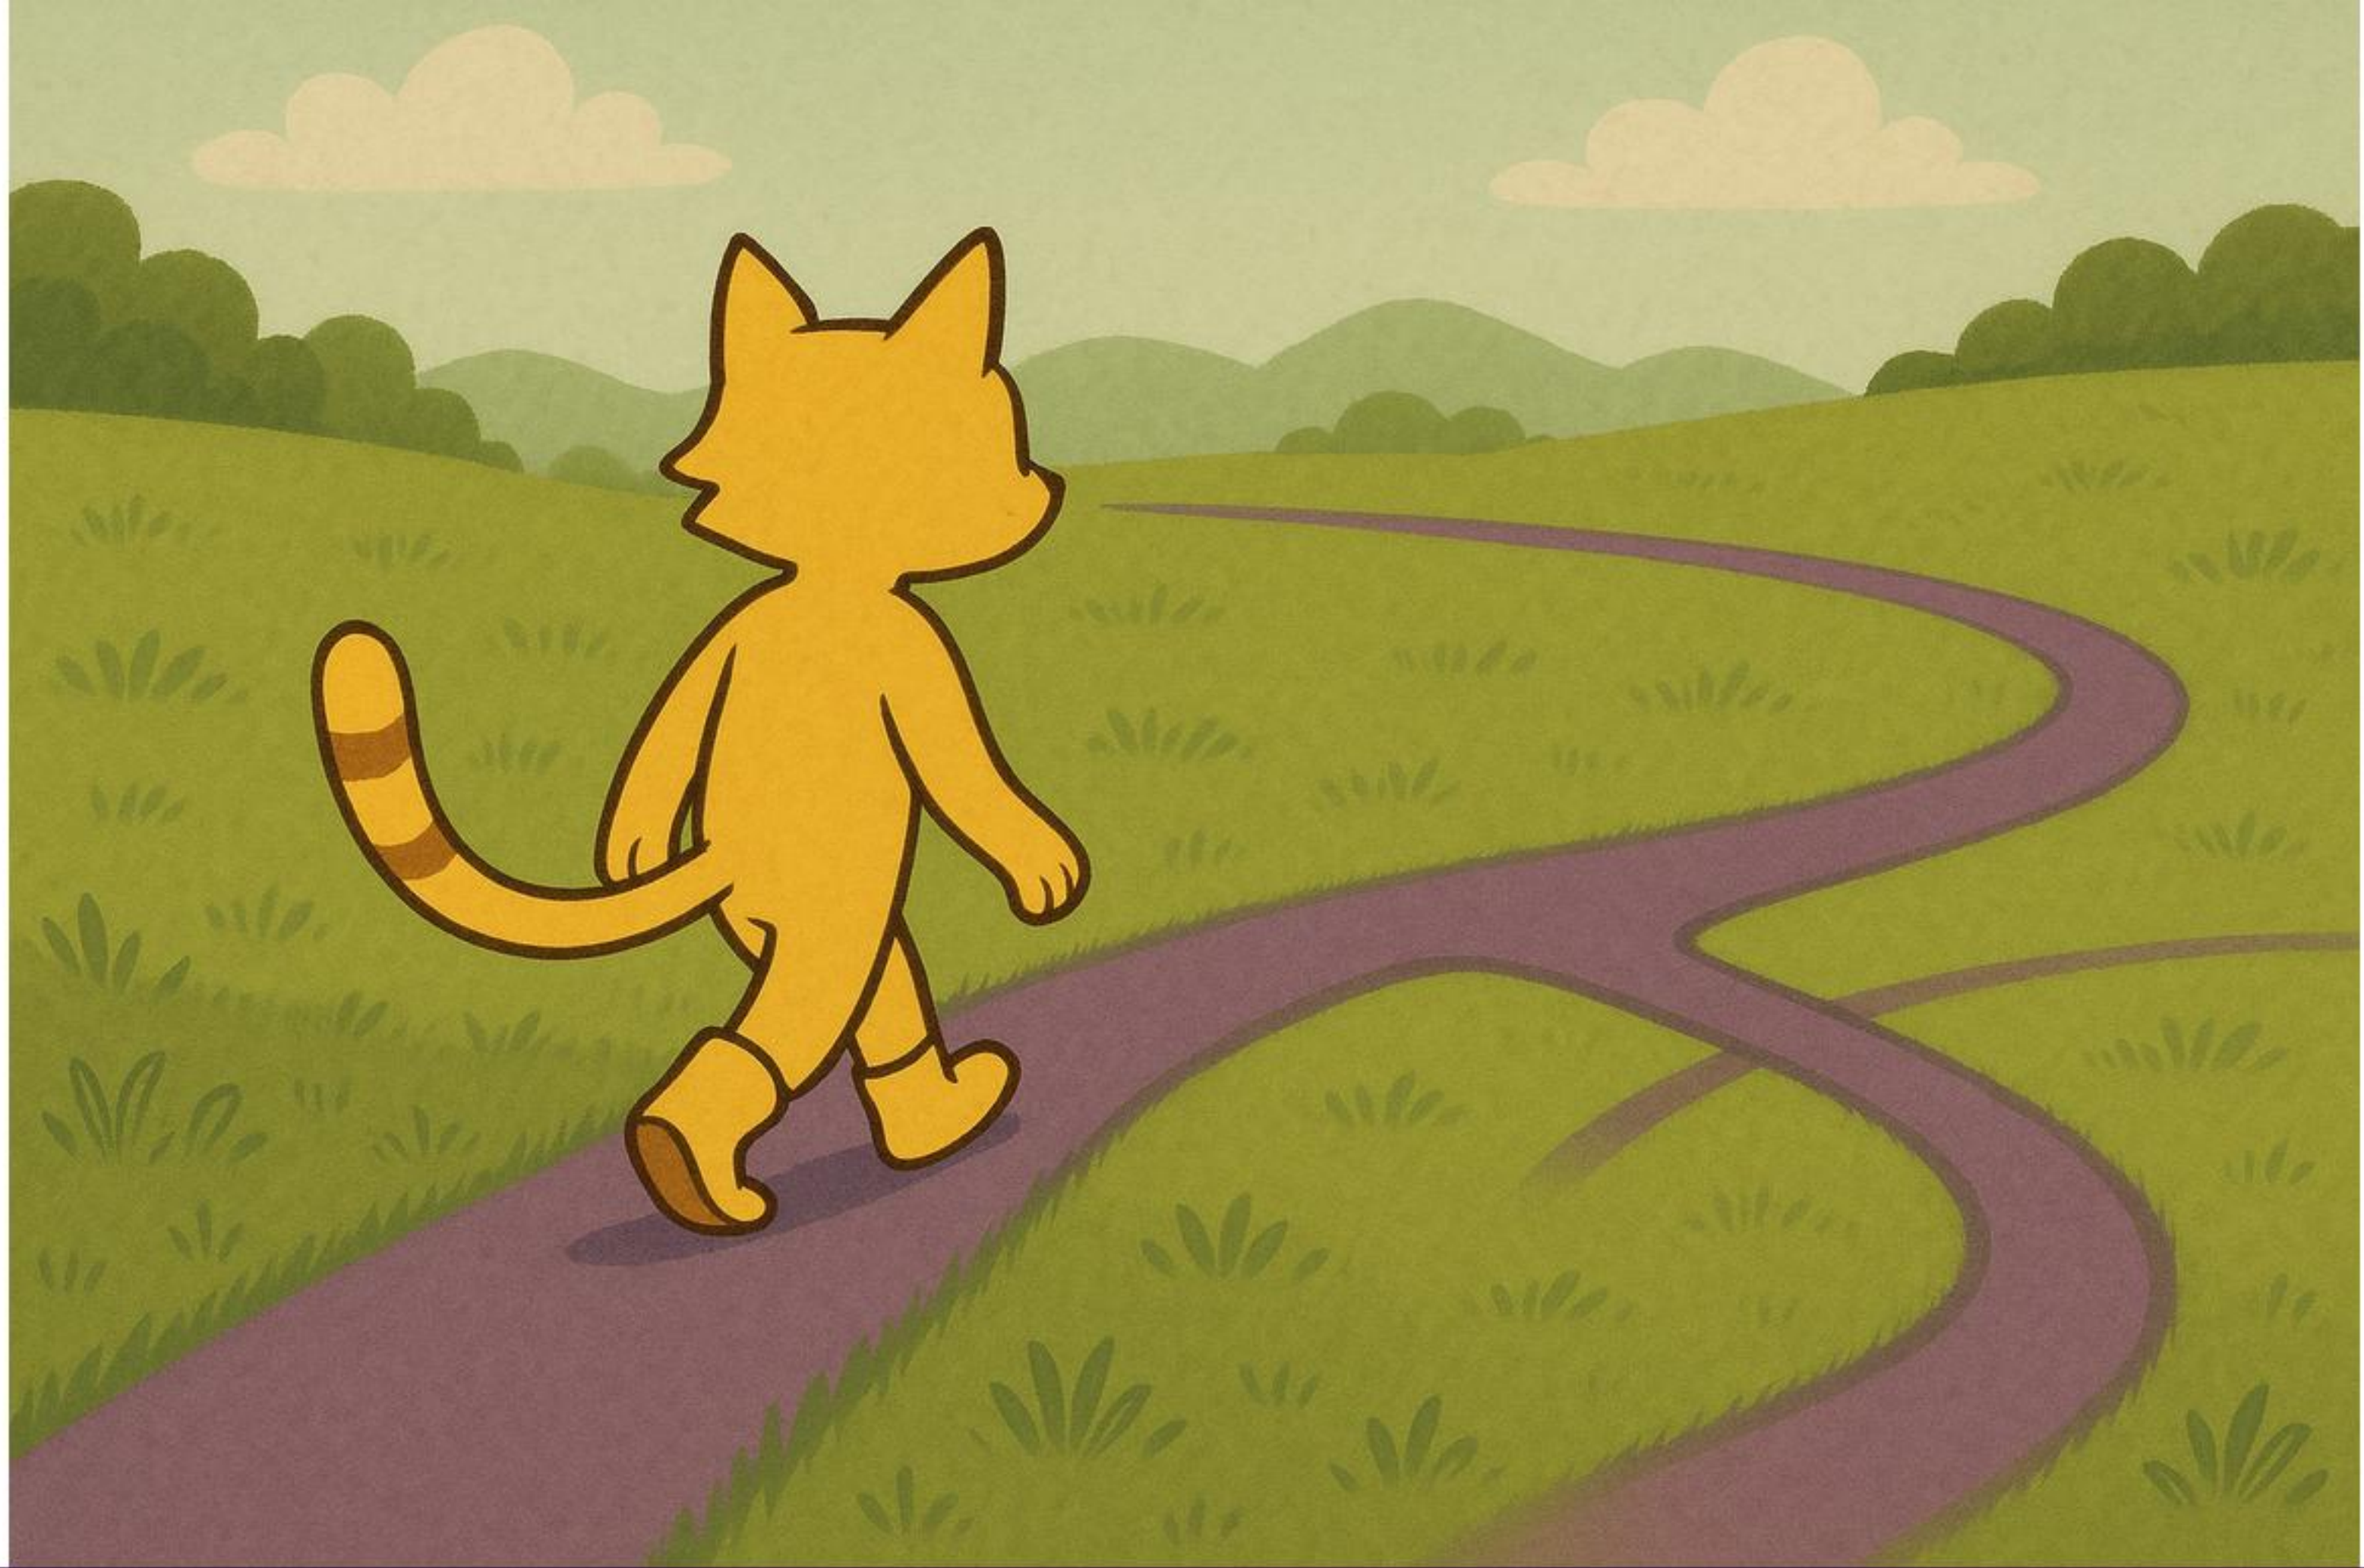

Electra tapped the water.
Circles grew from the tap.

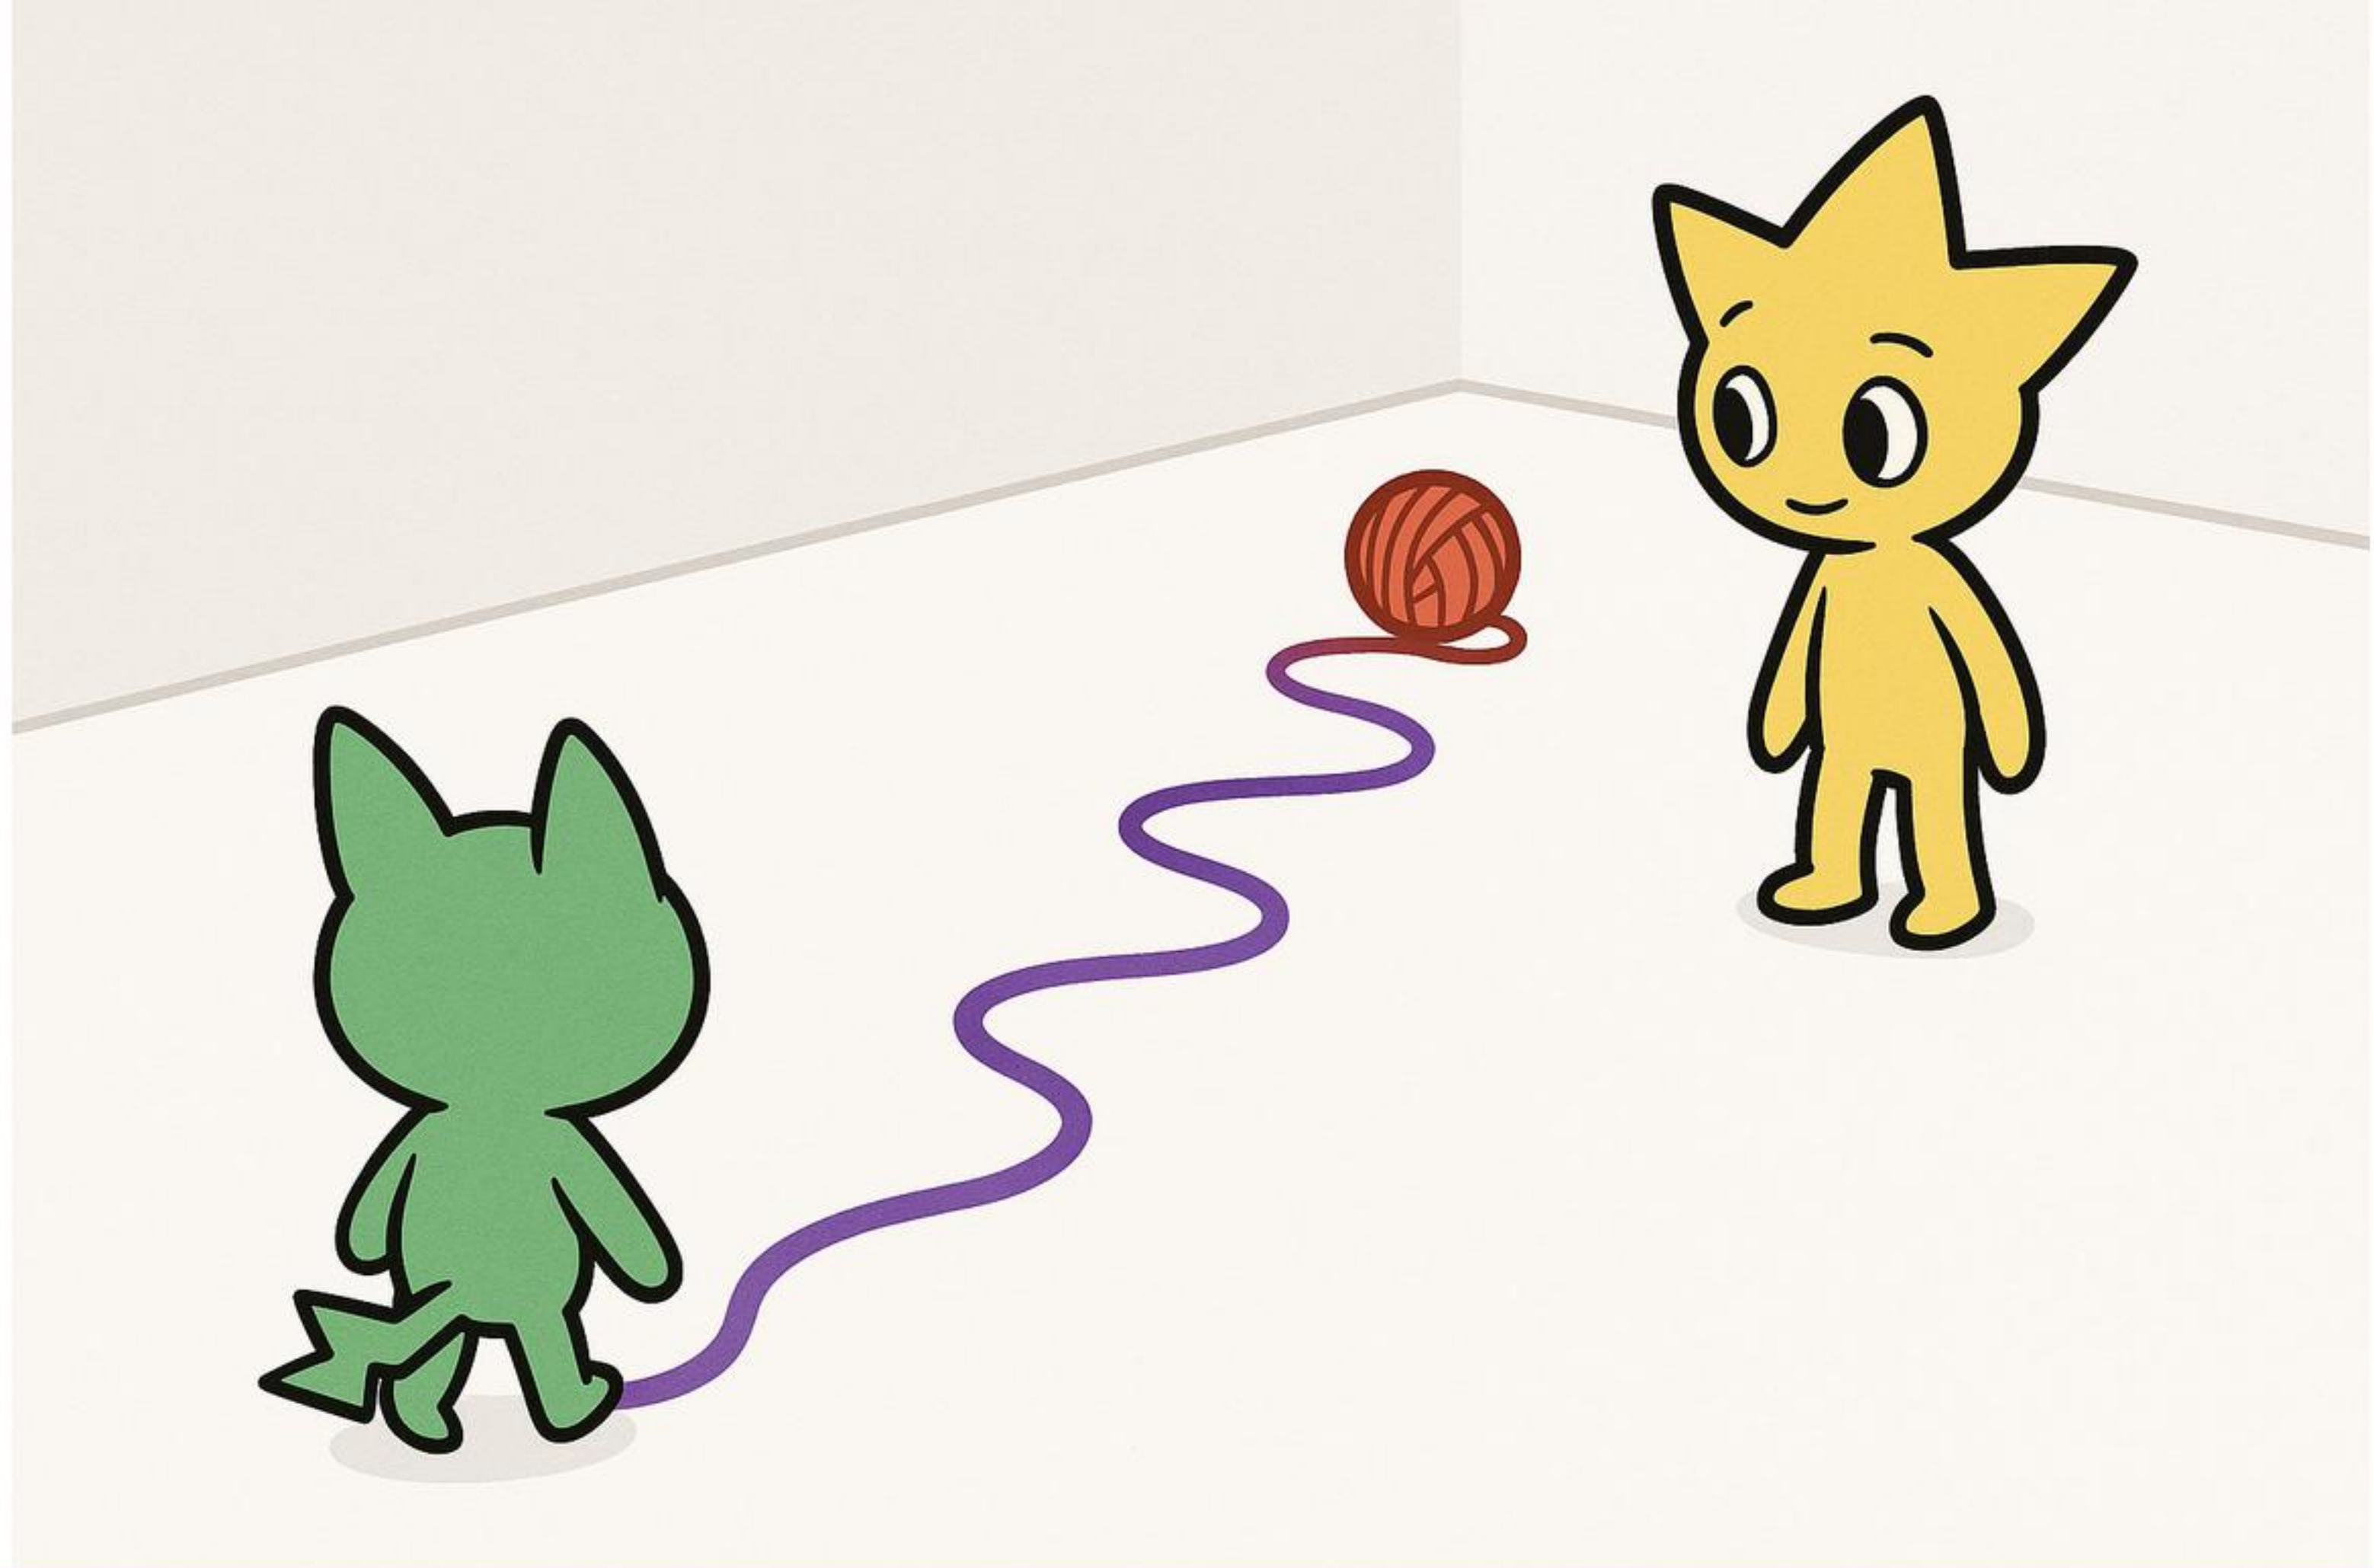

Poz clapped.
Electra heard it after.

Poz walked past the light.
The shadow walked too.

Electra turned around.
The new trail met the old trail.

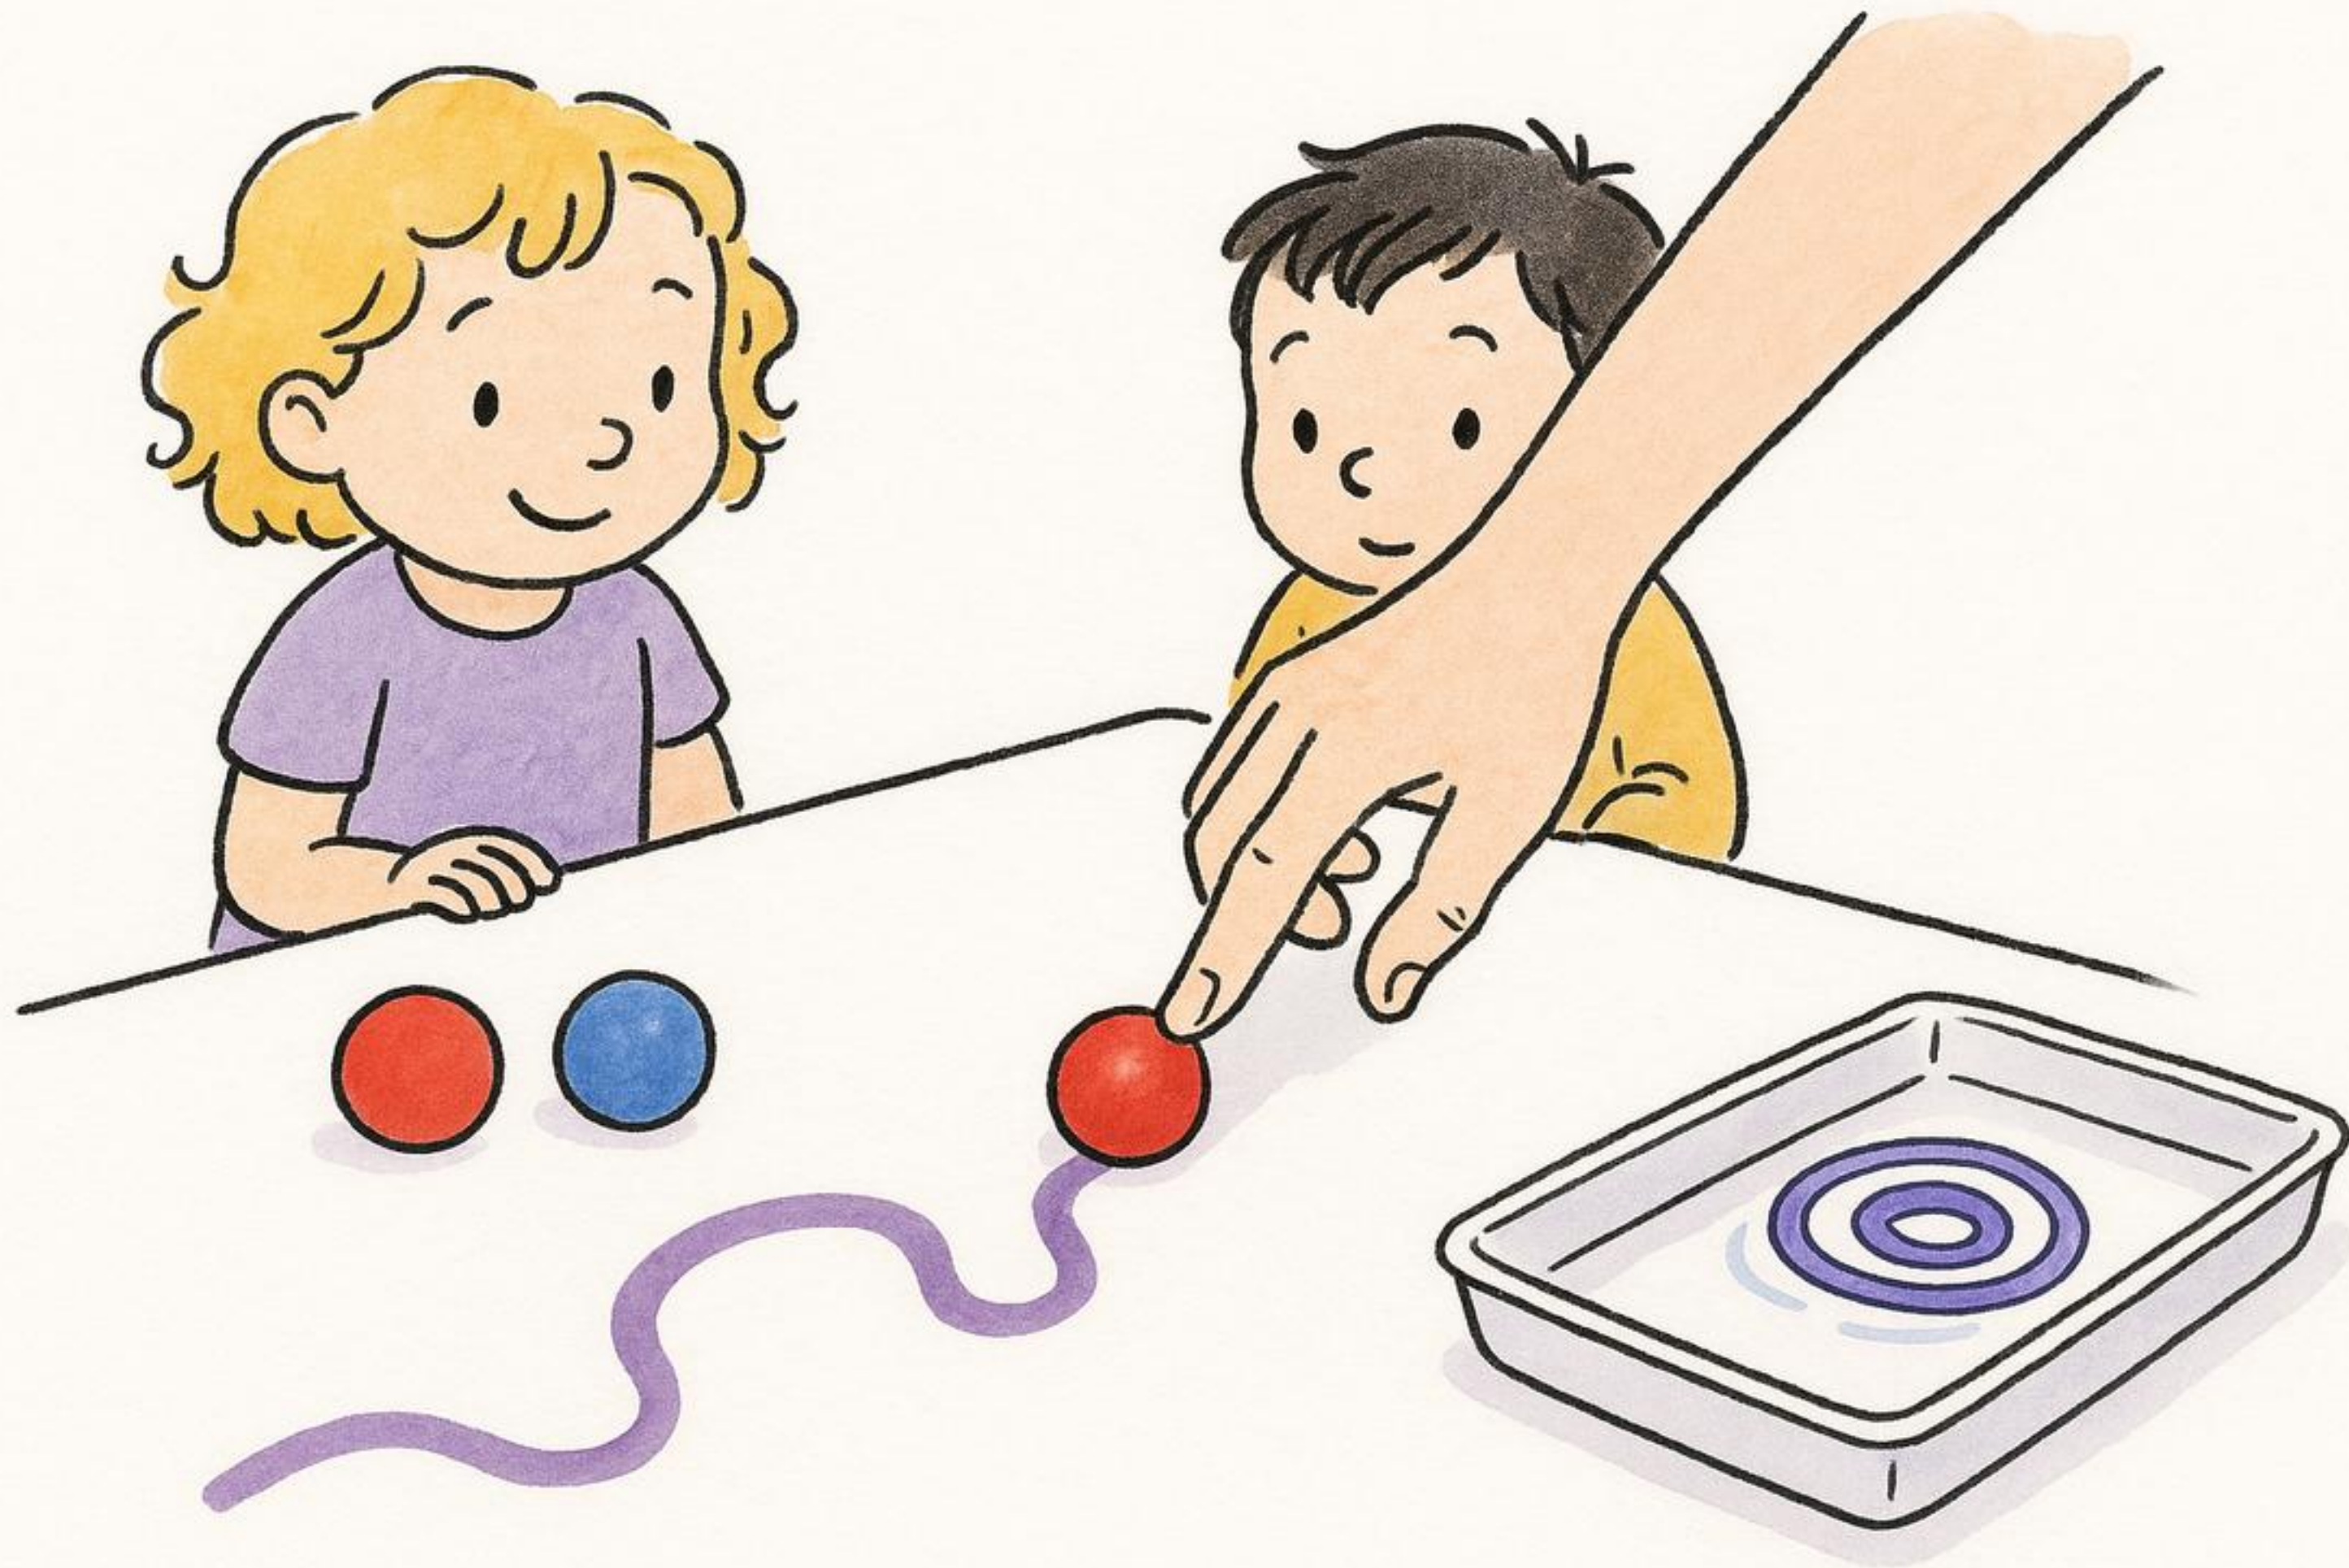

"Can we find where it went?"
Poz followed the trail.

Ribbon.
Water.
Sound.
Shadow.
They all showed motion.

It moved.
The world remembered.

Electra and Poz sit by a white play surface while a grown-up hand gently makes a simple purple ribbon trace or places the red ball at the start of a purple trail. The red and blue balls are both visible for repeating and comparing. A shallow white water tray with one small set of purple-blue rings may sit nearby, but it must not crowd the main ribbon/ball trace. Keep all traces physical and visible; no arrows, no labels, no symbols, no abstract panels.
